Books: Alantani's Legacy

A Hebrew printing press located in Híjar on 15th century is the origin of some of the main printed incunabula in the Iberian Peninsula, which today are the object of study in the most prestigious universities in the world. The tracking of the clues left in these books and the peculiar life of its printer will give life to this story in documentary feature film format. Two lines of argument have been followed: the life of the printer and, in parallel, the research on these texts that has led us to interview the world's leading experts on this subject. These interviews, starring the researcher Lucía Conte, have taken us to settings found in places as diverse as Madrid, Barcelona, Oxford, Jerusalem, Jaffa-Tel Aviv, New York, and Philadelphia.

The word 'incunabula' translates literally to "swaddling clothes" or "bands holding the baby in a cradle." The "baby" in this case is a figurative one, referring to a book that was produced when the art of printing was still in its infancy. Thus, books printed between 1453 (the date of the invention of modern printing) and 1500, from some 1,200 printers, distributed among 260 cities, with an approximate release of 35,000 different works, are recognized as incunabula.
